

CALL FOR PAPERS

Review of interventions focused on forcibly displaced populations [Sept. 2017]

The International Rescue Committee is requesting papers examining the impact of interventions targeting forcibly displaced populations to be included in a rapid evidence review

A review team led by the International Rescue Committee and Dr. Ellie Ott at the University of Oxford are looking for any papers (published or unpublished) covering impact evaluation evidence for interventions that target forcibly displaced populations in low- or middle-income countries, particularly those that may not have been found through database searches. Study designs must be experimental or quasi-experimental with comparison groups and strong accounting for potential confounding factors. Studies can examine the effectiveness of any intervention approach except for clinical or hospital-based health treatment. All papers that meet inclusion criteria will be synthesized in a rapid evidence review funded by the World Bank to better understand the effectiveness of various interventions targeting forcibly displaced women, men, girls, and boys.

Please send any questions or relevant papers to Dr. Ellie Ott at ellie.ott@education.ox.ac.uk by September 18th, 2017.