How counties are losing billions in legal fees scandal

Auditor-General's report reveals lawyers raking in billions from devolved units that ignore set guidelines to save taxpayer funds

BY COLLINS OMULO

Marsabit County Public Service Board procured legal services from a law firm at Sh10.3 million to defend a civil case where the plaintiff had sued for Sh1 million in damages arising from the unlawful detention of a motor vehicle, an audit report has revealed.

The report by Auditor-General Nancy Gathungu for the financial year ending June 2024 revealed that there was no evidence of the application of the Advocates Remuneration Order of 2014 in determining the legal fee.

However, Marsabit's case is not isolated, with lawyers raking in billions, often picked from a pre-qualified list with no further assessment as to legal costs and internal capacities, and firms getting more than half of the cases—and the money.

CITY HALL CASE Outrageous fees

Nairobi County has perennially hit the headlines over its outrageous legal fees, with the Governor Johnson Sakaja-led administration owing four advocates Sh6.26 billion—representing 29 percent of the total pending legal fees of Sh21.37 billion.

This amount comprises an outstanding legal fees balance of Sh17.1 billion and decretal sums of Sh4.26 billion. Decretal sums are money awarded in a court decree, encompassing the principal amount, costs, and any accrued interest. The pending legal fees represent 11 per cent of the county's entire pending bills.

Decretal sums are money awarded in a court decree, encompassing the principal amount, costs, and any accrued interest.

The pending legal fees represent 11 per cent of the county's entire pending bills.

The county government is battling 1,086 ongoing legal cases, resulting in numerous legal claims incidental to its operations—whose outcome and financial impact or loss may not be ascertained or quantified.

"If those contingent liabilities crystallise, the county may be exposed to a huge cash outlay, which may affect its ability to meet obligations when they fall due, thus impacting service delivery," reads the report.

"It was noted that most of the court cases related to issues such as unpaid claims for goods, works or services completed by contractors, unprocedural termination of employment contracts, irregular procurement processes, and poor contract management," it adds.

Raising further concerns, the report revealed that advocates were appointed directly from a list of prequalified legal firms, without subjecting the process to a mini-competition—such as forming an ad hoc evaluation committee to assess quotations for legal services. No evaluation reports were provided either.

"In the circumstances, the audit could not verify how the legal firms were selected to provide services to the county. This lack of a competitive process may have resulted in inflated costs and missed opportunities to engage more qualified service providers," the report said.

City Hall was also on the spot over unfair award of cases and payments to advocates.

Of 159 court cases as of June 2024, 65 were assigned to just eight advocates, with each handling between four and 20 cases.

Curiously, the management did not provide an explanation for the criteria used to allocate multiple cases to the eight advocates out of 350 prequalified law firms.

This was contrary to Regulation

91(5) of the Public Procurement and Asset Disposal Regulations, 2020, which requires fair and equitable rotation among prequalified service providers.

In some cases, advocates defending new cases were paid, while older cases have remained unpaid for years.

Narok paid Sh364.9 million in legal fees—exceeding its Sh337.3 million budget by Sh27.6 million.

Kajiado incurred Sh79.1 million in legal fees, with law firms procured directly without written approval from the accounting officer or justification for urgency. Consequently, the fees were not competitively priced.
